With workplaces in some areas starting to reopen after the loosening or lifting of COVID-19 restrictions, health experts are claiming that workers will return to a different type of workplace than which they had previously known. While social distancing and other factors will impact how organizations function, recent protests regarding race and equality may also play a role in shaping how organizations move forward.

Diversity and inclusion training is not new. Nearly 85 percent of Fortune 500 companies have some form of diversity and inclusion practices. What may be new in some companies is how to address these concerns and move forward in a way that allows all employees to feel valued for their unique talents and who they are.

How as business owners and managers do we do this? How do we build environments where employees feel like they belong?

Join TRICOM and Haley Marketing for our June Industry Insider webinar, as we review recommendations from some of the smartest people in the world about how to plan for—and even thrive in—economic downturns. We'll also take a look at some of the marketing techniques staffing companies have used to limit their losses during the Great Recession and recover significantly faster than the majority of firms in the industry.

By the end of this session, you'll know how to plan for, recover faster from and even thrive in turbulent economic times.
